Medical Dissertation, Research Paper & Manuscript Writing, Rewriting & Editing Services – Academic & Education

Most medical students, fellows, and residents find writing a scientific medical manuscript challenging than working gruelling hours on the clinical service. Further, they find harder to follow the guidelines and to prepare an extensive summary of previous studies. Most of the medical professionals also find difficult to handle statistical analysis section. Therefore, in reality, most of the manuscript gets rejected by the first journal of submission while other 20% returned with a recommendation.

Further, students those pursue MD or DM degree submission of the dissertation is one of the requirement. The degree of Doctor of Medicine (MD or DM) thesis is a test more of scientific rather than clinical ability and normally provides some contribution to medical knowledge. Initially, case reports and reviews of literature predominated, but as the scientific method found its place in medicine, the faculty has required that dissertations presented be based on original investigation either in the laboratory or in the clinic. This experience is considered an important and essential phase of a curriculum which is designed to promote the development of critical judgment, habits of self-education and imagination, as well as the acquisition of knowledge and research skills.

The first evidence that the thesis or dissertation was considered a requirement for the degree of Doctor of Medicine is a statement in the catalogue from 1839, which in part reads, "...the candidate must present a dissertation on some subject connected with the medical sciences. Hence, the most important quality needed for undertaking such a kind of work is a) enthusiasm for original work and b) studying a subject in-depth Writing an MD thesis is easier for those who have already written articles and received the criticism of editors.
